ÜBER DIE KONFERENZ

PUBLIC SPACE: FIGHTS AND FICTIONS

36-STUNDEN-DENKFABRIK

19. – 21. MAI 2016

Wie wollen wir den öffentlichen Raum im 21. Jahrhundert nutzen? Wie kann eine kritische Öffentlichkeit den öffentlichen Raum als demokratische Plattform politischer und gesellschaftlicher Auseinandersetzungen gestalten?

Reale Konfliktzone oder Fiktion? Der öffentliche Raum ist untrennbar verbunden mit den Parametern der jeweiligen Kulturen und Gesellschaften sowie deren historischen Veränderungen. So stellen in den letzten Jahrzehnten weltweite Migration, soziale Konflikte und globale Wirtschafts- und Finanzinteressen oder die Emanzipation von autoritären Strukturen den öffentlichen Raum vor massive Herausforderungen. Er wird weltweit zum Austragungsort gewaltiger Veränderungen und grundlegender Paradigmenwechsel. Zwischen Sicherheit und Überwachung, zwischen Partizipation und Kommerzialisierung, zwischen künstlerischer und sozialer Freiheit und der Demonstration von Herrschaft entscheidet sich im öffentlichen Raum die Zukunft von Demokratie und Lebensqualität.

Während der 36-Stunden-Denkfabrik sollen die oft in Konflikt stehenden Ansprüche an den öffentlichen Raum analysiert und gemeinsam verhandelt werden. Die Denkfabrik bringt Theoretiker, Praktiker, Aktivisten und Künstler zusammen, um Ideen und Visionen im direkten Austausch mit allen Teilnehmern zu produzieren: Es geht um die Zukunft des öffentlichen Raums als politischer Raum.

Eine gemeinsame Veranstaltung der Akademie der Künste, Berlin, und des Goethe-Instituts.

ABOUT THE CONFERENCE

PUBLIC SPACE: FIGHTS AND FICTIONS

36-HOUR FACTORY OF THOUGHT

19 – 21 MAY 2016

How do we want to use public space in the 21st century? How can a critical public sphere shape public space as a democratic platform of political and social dispute and dialogue?

A real conflict zone or a fiction? Public space is intrinsically linked to the parameters of each particular culture and society and its historical changes. With worldwide migration, social conflicts, and global economic and financial interests or the emancipation from authoritarian structures, public space has been facing massive challenges over the last decades. Across the globe, it has become the scene of violent changes and fundamental paradigm shifts. Between security and surveillance, participation and commercialisation, artistic and social freedom and the demonstration of power, public space is where the future of democracy and the quality of life is being decided.

The 36-Hour Factory of Thought is designed to provide a forum for jointly analysing and negotiating often conflicting claims to public space. It brings together theoreticians, practitioners, activists and artists to generate ideas and visions in a direct exchange with all participants. What is at stake is the future of public space as a political space.

Organised by the Goethe-Institut and the Akademie der Künste, Berlin.

KEYNOTES AND DENKRÄUME

The Factory of Thought is more than just a conference. For 36 hours, talented thinkers, theorists, practitioners, and activists are gathering from around the globe to develop a more concrete understanding of approaches to the complex expectations placed on public space as a sphere/location where the future of democracy and the quality of life is being decided.

The Factory of Thought is dedicated to exchanging thoughts and working on new ideas.

As content and form are intrinsically linked and all content is potentially good content, we want to ensure that there is space for all forms of thought from keynote presentations to round tables (Denkraum), interviews, pop-up think tanks, a news room, performances, film screenings, radio plays, and partying. We also invite and encourage our guests to stage their own panels during the 36 hours. These myriad formats supported by a full programme offer a multiplicity of possibilities to express and exchange ideas.

All keynotes are presented in the auditorium. They will be simultaneously translated into German or English. Each of the conference keynotes is accompanied by a Denkraum (Round Table). The Denkräume provide a focused continuation of debates initiated by the keynotes, opening them up and supplementing them with perspectives and statements from keynote speakers and other experts. Participation in the Denkräume is subject to prior registration. Nevertheless, if the Denkraum you want to attend is already booked out, no worries: all the discussions will also be live streamed in audio to the auditorium.

At times throughout the conference, Critical Observers will report from the debates so visitors and participants can keep up to date on developments.

STATEMENTS

ANNA MINTON

Security and Surveillance—Public Space as Threat?

The nature of public space and the public realm is changing as more and more public space is privatised—privately owned, privately controlled and policed by uniformed security guards and 24-hour CCTV. In the UK, this is the template for all new development, which also features in North America and to a lesser extent in Europe; in New York hundreds of innocuous sounding 'POPS'—the acronym for publicly-owned public spaces—define public space in the city. This upside down definition of public space—where public is private—is turning the notion of 'The Right to the City' on its head; public space is increasingly characterised by 'smart' security technologies adapted from military to civilian use which exclude rather than include, and routinely ban a whole range of people, protests and behaviours—a ban that extends to the democratic rights to the city.

DOREEN HENG LIU

Re-Production of Space. NODE's current works on renovation

Today, with the world experiencing diverse and profound changes as well as an accelerated process of urbanization, crises such as available land use-up, energy shortage, climate change, population explosion and sustainable development have become common concerns. Though China may have grasped the last opportunity of accelerated urbanization, it is now confronting a development bottleneck and the dilemma of whether to continue such acceleration or let it slow down. Should we repeat the paradigm of western development, or take a different path, creating an unprecedented and innovative urban paradigm? In this context, as urban architects working in South China, NODE argues for critical participation in the spirit of experiment.

KATHRIN RÖGGLA

Fake Cities, Fiction Cities, Fictitious Cities

Starting from the diverse locations of civil society interventions, Kathrin Röggl describes a re-configuration of public space in the shadow of post-democracy. Berlin in particular stands exemplarily for the way space becomes liquid and flexible through an interplay of lobbyism, event formats, rumour mills and drives for temporary use, and new definitions of public spaces are constantly being created. It seems as though the 'Fake City' twenty years ago is now the 'Fiction City', as if the sole objective were to find to right narrative as an overwrite. This new orientation has to face resistance from a gradually consolidating security regime, the need for control in a 'society of fear', and the confusion generated by never-ending stream of delegations of responsibility.

Arrival Cities as a Bazaar

In 2015, more than one million refugees came to Germany, fleeing war and hardship in their old home countries. They have fled because they hope to find a better future, a new 'heimat'. Through Making Heimat. Germany, Arrival Country, the contribution of the German Pavilion for the Biennale di Architettura in Venice, Peter Cachola Schmal and the Deutsches Architektur-museum team seek to address the core question: What conditions are needed in arrival cities, from an urban planning and architectural perspective, for immigrants to successfully integrate in Germany? How is Germany meeting the need to house hundreds of thousands of refugees? And how is this concept being presented inside the pavilion on the Giardini hill from the following week on?

Contested Space in a City in Flux: Scenes From Public space in Post-Revolution Cairo

During the period of turmoil following the 2011 revolution, Cairo's political and urban landscapes experienced a temporary "suspension of order." Taking advantage of such vacuum, individuals and communities engaged in informal practices to reclaim their streets and neighborhoods, contesting formal structures and negotiating alternative orders to settle spatial conflict. This presentation attempts to capture some of these practices and alternative orders of contestation and negotiation over public space.

State of Emergency Urbanism: From Cairo to Brussels, the Police is the Architect

France is still living under the state of emergency granting extra powers to a police force that, time and again, has proven its antagonism towards the post-colonial population of the French banlieues (suburbs). Belgium followed suit with its heavy policing and systematic suspicion of the Molenbeek municipality in Brussels. This lecture presents several examples of the police's strategic influence on architecture and public space in Europe as well as in Palestine and Egypt with one question in mind: When the police and the architect become one entity, does this produce the very essence of architecture?

*Fights and Fictions:
The Sharing Movement*

While architecture is oftentimes reduced to the production of buildings, architecture is also the practice of envisioning cities and civic form. In the process of producing these urban edifices that house social, political and spatial relations, architects produce new models of society in its operational and aspirational terms, constantly innovating new forms of collective life.

Following the trails of globalization and after an era of individuation, starchitectures and singular developments, a new culture is emerging marked by a return to notions of collectivity. Fuelled by new technologies and a growing awareness of available resources, the sharing movement is radically changing the way we work, move, build and produce new ideas and knowledge.

How will the current sharing movement affect the way we inhabit and build the cities of tomorrow?

The "Next "Invasive" Is "Native"

Cooking Sections, 2016

In the no-man's land along the Berlin Wall, amongst the concrete debris of post-World War II, a newcomer managed to settle where nobody else did. Japanese knotweed, a 'non-native' 'invasive' plant that thrives in anthropogenic soils, colonised the isolated urban wastelands of the strip. Even today, humans classify natural species into those that belong to a certain place and those that do not. Some plants or animals which are 'non-native' to a specific location and rapidly spread are believed to cause severe damage to the local environment, economy or human health. These are often described as 'aliens', 'invaders', or 'pests'. Increasingly since the 1950s, many human and non-human migration discourses have used the figure of the 'non-native' or the 'alien' as a negative input for 'native' contexts. Scaremongering, deflation of property value, and the refusal to grant mortgages to homeowners that have found Japanese knotweed on their premises are processes which have generated a growing market of expensive eradication programmes. As perceptions of 'native', 'alien', and 'invasive' species profoundly change over time, this raises the question of what a pristine landscape is and who defines it. Expect drinks!

Waste Agency

Tentative Collective

Waste Agency contextualizes urban rituals in the construction of progress through experimental conversations with discarded things; it relates the consumption of modernity to its parallel universe of peripheral, abandoned objects. The project not only explores discarded things, but also digital waste, and redundant lives. It presents waste as a complex ecology with a particular agency, aesthetics, language and time, exerting its power back on the city from its cast-away peripheries. Those peripheries not only speak of modernity's exclusions, but also of the inextricable connection between the environment/ecology and capitalism. This project explores 'being' as defined by the aesthetics, politics and fictions of waste.

22 min, 26'10 south Architects & Goethe-Institut Johannesburg, South Africa, 2012

In 2012, fifty-one architecture students worked with thirty community planners living in informally settled warehouses, factories and on open plots of Marlboro South (Johannesburg, South Africa), an Apartheid buffer designed to contain and separate Alexandra, one of Johannesburg's oldest townships. Based on a request from an alliance of NGOs and informal residents this transforming area was extensively documented during the 7-week university course. Evictions of informal inhabitants taking place at the time led to a post-course engagement in which re-settlement solutions were developed together with residents.

Make City Festival was inaugurated in 2015. The festival Make City—Resourcing the Urban is about discovering and optimising our urban resources, whether they be spatial, material or based upon the vast potential of civic engagement. The festival brings together numerous urban initiatives both in Berlin and internationally. Urban Open Source is a key notion within the festival: a focus upon participation, upon making and thinking about the city differently—as a mutual project.

Drill Team

Live Performance at the Federal Center,

Chicago, October 2–3, 2015

Film by Andy Resek, 6 min

The project We Know How to Order multiplies and transforms the spatial grid of the Federal Center in Chicago. Conceived for the Chicago Architecture Biennial, this collaborative performance was created by artist-architect Bryony Roberts and choreographer Asher Waldron of the South Shore Drill Team.

Built between 1959 and 1974, Mies van der Rohe's Federal Center in Chicago is a space of national government unified by a relentless and ever-present grid. A module of 4 foot 8 inches connects three buildings and the plaza between them from the facades down to the paving stones of the plaza. Responding to this space of both, federal authority and spatial order, the project introduces a dynamic performance by the South Shore Drill Team, merging military drill routines with hip-hop choreography. Known throughout Chicago for their powerful performances, the South Shore Drill Team trains young people in precise drill routines with flags and rifles. For this performance, the South Shore Drill Team altered the order of the Federal Center, transforming the lines of the architectural grid through high-energy flag-tossing and rifle-spinning. The project calls attention to expectations for public space in the U.S. and inverts conventional power dynamics, with young people from the South Side taking over a space of federal government and an architectural landmark with an electrifying system of movement.

Der amerikanische Investor

by Jan Peter Bremer, Director Oliver Sturm, Editor Christina Hänsel, WDR 2013, 53 min, in German

With a white wall in front of him and the empty page of his notebook before him, a writer struggles to formulate the first sentence. Since the words refuse to come, he jumps up and—for the hundredth time—checks the condition of his apartment. An American investor is refurbishing the old apartment block where the writer lives with his wife and two children, and now the floors are sloping and the walls developing cracks. The writer decides to send the American investor a letter—which also takes him back to the empty page. His inability to compose the first sentence finds its counterpart in his inability to do anything (with himself)—communicate with his wife and children, do household chores, or protest against a higher authority. The microcosm of everyday life meets the macrocosm of global power structures.

Big City Nightwork. Hörwerk Nr. 15
by Barry Bermange, SWR 1990, 48 min
(starts every two hours)

"The city in my new audio piece is a place of strange acoustic information resonating with the atmosphere of an unknown and, at times, hostile night world. The darkness carries the sound waves over long distances, produces spatial depth, mysterious connections between ungraspable phenomena which may be sensed but not seen, may be perceptible yet escape the eye. The city at night vibrates with different words and noises, expresses itself in the emptiness of space. The composition primarily takes original soundtracks, trying to illustrate how a musical structure is created through staging the material, its orchestration and de-familiarisation. Big City Nightwork shows how documentation takes a step back, is pushed into the background, and how it is changed by the intervention of composition. This makes new interpretations accessible and opens up perspectives on an unfamiliar and, at the same time, de-familiarised darkness." (Barry Bermange)

ELECTRICAL WALKS
Electromagnetic Investigation in the City
by Christina Kubisch

For nearly 30 years, Christina Kubisch has been working with the system of electromagnetic induction. The Electrical Walks, a further development of her sound installations, are a work in progress, and an invitation to take part in city walks of a special kind. In this case the acoustic perception of aboveground and underground electromagnetic fields are not suppressed, but instead become amplified and audible with particularly sensitive electromagnetic wireless headphones.

The palette of these noises, their timbre and volume, vary from site to site and from country to country. They have one thing in common: they are ubiquitous, even where one would not expect them. Light systems, transformers, radar systems, anti-theft security devices, surveillance cameras, power lines, computers, wireless Internet, streetcar cables, antennas, automated teller machines, neon advertising, mobile navigation systems, etc., create a spectrum of electrical fields that are as if hidden under cloaks of invisibility, but of incredible presence. In addition to its "global players," every nation and every city has completely individual electromagnetic sound landscapes.

The Electrical Walks are part of the music programme Decentralized Music in the frame of the exhibition DEMO:POLIS—The Right to Public Space.

EXHIBITION

DEMO:POLIS—The Right to Public Space presents the possibilities that the public has to shape its own city. The anonymous, virtual public space of the Internet and the real streets and squares are both locations for people's demands as well as subject to their claim to freedom. A new project of enlightenment vis-à-vis those in power is unfolding, both on the Internet as well as in real public spaces. Increasingly critical city dwellers are demanding their say in decisions affecting these public spaces. Both the right to publicness and public freedoms are asserted in public space: DEMO:POLIS.

BIOGRAPHIES AND STATEMENTS

NANA ADUSEI-POKU

Nana Adusei-Poku is Research Professor in Cultural Diversity at Rotterdam University and a lecturer in Media Arts at the University of the Arts, Zurich. She graduated in African Studies and Gender Studies at Humboldt University and in Media and Communications at Goldsmiths College, University of London. Her work as a scholarship doctoral student at Humboldt University Berlin focused on the curatorial concept of 'post-black' in relation to contemporary black artists. She has been a visiting scholar at the University of Ghana, Legon, the London School of Economics, and Columbia University, New York. Among her publications, she contributed "The Challenge to Conceptualise the Multiplicity of Multiplicities—Post-Black Art and Its Intricacies" to Post-racial Imaginaries, a special issue of Dark Matter last year. Her research interests are in cultural studies, visual culture, black diaspora, art history, postcolonial and critical race theory.

JULIA ALBANI

Independent curator and critic Julia Albani (1977, Herford, Germany) is based in Lisbon and Berlin and director of the cultural communications office BUREAU N. She specialises in inspiring and facilitating exchange between individuals and institutions engaged in outstanding work in the fields of humanising architecture, urbanism and design. Since 2003, she has supervised exhibitions, conference and publication projects, first at urban drift in Berlin (2003–2007), then at the Swiss Architecture Museum in Basel (2007–2009) before joining the curatorial team of the Architecture Triennial in Lisbon in (2009–2012). In 2010 she curated the Portuguese Pavilion at the Venice Architecture Biennale, co-curated the European project We-Traders—Swapping Crisis for City (2013–15) and the Futurospective Architecture—Sou Fujimoto exhibition at CCB Lisbon (2013). Since 2012 she has been the director of BUREAU N together with Silke Neumann, working with international architecture museums, galleries, foundations and festivals, including the Marrakech Biennale, Deutsches Architekturmuseum, Swiss Federal Office for Culture, Centro Cultural de Belem, project bauhaus, Lofoten International Art Festival, Museum of Architecture and Design Ljubljana, and the Venice Architecture Biennale. Julia Albani has worked closely with the Akademie der Künste and the Goethe-Institut since 2012.

ARCHI DEBOUT

#ArchiDebout is a group of committed architects occupying public space with ephemeral architectures in Paris since early April as part of the Nuit Debout movement. They organise assemblies to free up ideas about architecture, and are writing a cooperative manifesto on new ways to build a more democratic society. The ArchiDebout Construction Division is presently producing architecture reduced to its simplest forms of expression. Since these structures are, in principle, illegal, a strongly innovative approach is needed to provide architectures for Nuit Debout protesters every night, from covered areas for meetings to a broadcasting studio for local station RadioDebout, the EnfantsDebout space for children, space for logistics, and so on ...

KATJA AßMANN

Katja Aßmann, who studied architecture and art history in Bochum, was appointed as the artistic director of Urbane Künste Ruhr in early 2012. Within the remit of securing the effects of Ruhr.2010, she has designed and developed the project's new artistic direction and organisation, curating her own as well as co-productions with regional and international artists and collectives. In 2016, among other projects, Katja Aßmann curated the Emscherkunst 2016 exhibition, together with Florian Matzner. She is one of a trio of artistic directors, including Angelika Fitz and Martin Fritz, responsible for the international network project Actopolis—The Art of Action. In addition, for the Ruhrtriennale, she is curating the art intervention well,come with the osa_office for subversive architecture. Katja Aßmann's curatorial work is focused on art productions that develop their relevance for everyday urban life by transcending accepted thematic and institutional borders.

STATEMENT

For over 30 years, the Ruhr area has been engaged in a transformation process from an industrial metropolis to a cultural region, based entirely on a top-down strategy. Such major projects as the International Building Exhibition (IBA) Emscher Park or the Ruhr as European Capital of Culture in 2010 have opened the way for change without growth. But people only seem to have become aware of this shift over the last few years. The illusion is only slowly being dispelled that the solutions for shaping our living spaces in future will be steered by a distant authority in the political or industrial sphere. Numerous bottom-up initiatives have formed to address urgent urban issues. Here, though, the aim is not to play off the bottom-up and top-down approaches against each other. Political and planning decisions must follow the lead given by civil society commitment. In this process, the arts play the key role of pointing up the possible spaces for trying out new forms of democratic negotiations.

ETHEL BARAONA POHL

Critic, writer and curator Ethel Baraona Pohl (1970, El Salvador) is currently based in Barcelona where, together with César Reyes Nájera. She is the co-founder of the architectural research practice and independent publishing house dpr-barcelona. Their research and theoretical work is linked to leading publications in architectural discourse through, among other things, their roles on the editorial team of Quaderns d'arquitectura i urbanisme, and as advisors to Archis for Volume magazine. In her curatorial work, Ethel Baraona Pohl was associate curator for Adhocracy, first commissioned for the Istanbul Design Biennial in 2012 and later exhibited in New York and London. With César Reyes Nájera, she curated the third Think Space programme on "Money", and has recently curated, together with César Reyes and Pelin Tan, Adhocracy ATHENS at the Onassis Cultural Center in 2015.

STATEMENT

Society's reclamation of public sphere is that place where we can say that force follows fiction. With our imaginary full of references, some real, some invented by our own desires—from May 68, Superstudio's cautionary tales, and Lefebvre's 'Right to the City' to the Spanish Revolution in a world dominated by algorithms—the many ways we have to reset the system and find new ways to inhabit our cities will emerge from the collision of force and fiction. We need fiction as we need air to survive, but we also need to bring out the force to transform that collective imaginary into something new; to invent new words with new meanings to refer to the system we want to live in. An alchemy of the word in order to promote an alchemy of the world.

ANA DANA BEROŠ

Architect and curator Ana Dana Beroš (1979, Zagreb) focuses on creating uncertain, fragile environments that catalyse social change. She is the co-founder of ARCHISquad—Division for Architecture with Conscience, and its educational programmes Out of Focus: Architecture of Giving and urgentArchitecture—Open Advisory Centres for Citizens. Through her interest in architectural theory and experimental design, she co-initiated the Think Space and Future Architecture platforms. In 2014, Intermundia, her research project on Trans-European migration, was selected as the Wheelwright Prize finalist by Harvard GSD and received a special mention by the jury at the Venice Architecture Biennale. Her recent work includes interviews with international architects and theorists on the politics and poetics of space for Croatian Radio. She is currently curating the Zagreb Actopolis project.

STATEMENT

In the contemporary concept and practice of commoning, establishing grounds for negotiations is more important than elaborating the grounds to affirm what already is common. Urban localities need to include a heterogeneous spectrum of different perspectives and identities, but since conflict is imminent in this practice of local co-existences, the question that remains is: Who has the democratic vote for exclusion from the public sphere?

JAAKKO BLOMBERG

Helsinki-based culture producer, researcher, artist and activist, Jaakko Blomberg (1983, Haapajärvi) co-founded Yhteismaa, a non-profit organization specialising in new participatory city culture and social innovations. His projects, which all research and explore urban space, culture, people and community, range from an international flea market day to setting up a table for a thousand people to eat in the middle of a street, turning a street into a weekly flea market, pop-up restaurants in 'waste' spaces, art exhibitions and theatre in homes, as well as projects with refugees.

www.jaakkoblomberg.fi

STATEMENT

What is the city but the people? Public space is made for the people and by the people—something which often seems to be forgotten. We often have rules and regulations that make little or no sense for the people. As they were once written down, they are still followed. But if necessary the rules can and should change. The question should not be if something is possible or not, but how it is possible. Social media has given citizens the power to act in a new way. Now people have far more power to make their voice heard and unite for a common goal. In many cities, there have been major changes in the way people form their city. And reclaim public space. The trend is inevitable. The question now is how to find the best ways to support it and empower society.

PETER CACHOLA SCHMAL

Peter Cachola Schmal (1960, Altötting) was appointed as director of the Deutsches Architekturmuseum (DAM) in Frankfurt am Main in April 2006. He spent his childhood in Multan/Pakistan and Jakarta/Indonesia, as well as in Mülheim an der Ruhr, Holzminden and Baden-Baden in Germany. After studying architecture at the TU Darmstadt, he joined Behnisch+Partner in Stuttgart and then, from 1990 to 1993, Eisenbach+Partner in Zeppelinheim. From 1992 to 1997, he was an assistant professor at the TU Darmstadt, and from 1997 to 2000 taught architectural design at the University of Applied Sciences in Frankfurt am Main. Peter Cachola Schmal became a curator at the DAM in 2000, and director in 2006. The following year, he was German commissary general for the 7th International Architecture Biennale (BIA) in Sao Paulo. www.makingheimat.de

STATEMENT

With live and work constantly taking place in non-physical spheres, there is a growing desire to connect with ourselves again and meet physically. People are moving back into the cities, meeting up for real events and exchanging views in real conferences. Public space is needed now more than ever—yet this is essentially a western phenomenon. The Asian world does not have a notion of public spaces at all. Of course, democracy needs the public sphere, and both physical and non-physical transparency. But activating the public realm has the potential to overturn politics—and hence has always been feared by those in power. Moreover, the result may not necessarily be democratic at all. So in itself public space is not a guarantee for democracy.

MERIEM CHABANI & JOHN EDM

Paris and Algiers-based architect and urban planner, Meriem Chabani is an associate at TXKL architecture, and the co-founder and president of the New South association. Her work focuses on context sensitive approaches to developing countries, using design and the construction process as tools for creating and stimulating economies. She investigates the role of architecture in a globalised practice, building bridges between her professional practice in France, Algeria and Myanmar, and the New South research platform. In 2014, her project Remade in Bangladesh, a network of small scale textile factories in the city of Chittagong, received a LafargeHolcim Next Generation Award.

John Edom, based in Copenhagen and Paris, is co-founder and Vice-President of New South. He holds degrees in anthropology from the University of Sussex and in architecture from ENSA Paris-Malaquais, and is presently completing his M.Arch on the Political Architecture: Critical Sustainability programme at the Royal Danish Academy of Fine Arts, Copenhagen. His research focuses on government and grassroots responses to the 3.11 disaster in Japan, and the instrumental role of the tsunami in planning, city-making and community-building discourses. He has worked for MAP Architecture in Copenhagen, carrying out research on architecture and extreme environments, as well as for GRAAL Architecture in Paris. newsouth.fr

The opposition established between force and fiction is a fallacy in nature. Each relies on and exists through the other. As singular motivators, they are quick to fade and disappear: their grip on the public sphere is sustained by the extent of their ability to secure each other. Democracy is society's fiction, wished into existence through performative action within space. The public sphere bears witness to that prayer, its boundaries constantly redefined through dynamic occupation. The force of the public sphere derives from the fictions through which it is constantly imagined and re-imagined.

COOKING SECTIONS / DANIEL FERNANDEZ PASCUAL & ALON SCHWABE

Cooking Sections (Daniel Fernández Pascual & Alon Schwabe) is a London-based duo of spatial practitioners created to explore the systems that organise the WORLD through FOOD. Through installations, performance, mapping and video, their research-based practice explores the overlapping boundaries between visual arts, architecture and geopolitics. Cooking Sections was part of the exhibition at the United States Pavilion in the 2014 Venice Architecture Biennale. Their work has also been exhibited at the Neue Nationalgalerie, Berlin; Storefront for Art & Architecture, New York; dOCUMENTA(13); Peggy Guggenheim Collection, Venice; Q21, Vienna; UTS Art, Sydney; CA2M, Madrid; ACC Weimar; the HKW Berlin; and the 2014 Biennale INTERIEUR Kortrijk. In addition, they were residents in The Politics of Food at the Delfina Foundation, London.

STATEMENT

For centuries both human and non-human migration discourses have used the figure of the 'non-native' or 'the alien' as a negative input for equality and local inhabitation. Intertwining advantages and disadvantages of spaces of 'sameness' and 'otherness', the public sphere has created many fictions to generate more or less hostile, or hospitable, environments for newcomers. However, in the very basic idea of evolution, 'the alien' is inseparable from hybridisation and growth. In this sense, the use of fiction, and counter-fiction, is itself inside and outside a very valuable tactic for challenging abusive narratives and eventually re-thinking the future condition of a democratic society.

RENATO CYMBALISTA

Architect and urbanist Renato Cymbalista is Professor of Urban History and the History of Urbanism in the School of Architecture and Urbanism at the University of São Paulo (FAU-USP). He holds a PhD from FAU-USP, and a post-doc in history from the University of Campinas, and has been a guest professor at the Technische Universität Cottbus, Germany, Paris 7 (Diderot), Paris 1 (Sorbonne–Pantheon) and Parsons—the New School of Design. Renato Cymbalista coordinates the Sites of Memory and Conscience research group and the Lab for Other Urbanisms, and is president of the São Paulo-based NGO Instituto Pólis.

STATEMENT

As we know, in recent years civil society has been reclaiming public space and the right to the city in completely new ways and with a new intensity. This new trend is particularly strong in my country, Brazil, and in São Paulo, the city I live in. In our case, a major effort would be required to consider these new movements a fiction: they can be seen everywhere, especially among young people, who are demanding and creating public spaces.

As an urbanist, researcher and citizen, from my experience in São Paulo I can see the new trend of occupation of public space as a necessary means to reboot democracy. But I can also see that, in my city, democracy is already rebooting itself. Local government is very busy inventing new instruments, reframing existing ones, launching public calls ... just some of the many movements now showing that the necessary changes in government are already starting to happen.

DANIJELA DUGANDŽIĆ

Feminist activist, curator, cultural producer and creator, Danijela Dugandžić has been active in the women's movement and in the field of feminist art for twenty years. She is currently an acting directress of the CRVENA organisation and member of Red Mined, a feminist curatorial team. Together with a team of four researchers, architects and activists, she developed Gradologija (Cityology), a comprehensive research and activist programme dealing with questions of urban governance, the use and misuse of public space in the city, urban mobilization, and the possibilities of creating, maintaining, and developing what is known as the 'urban commons'. She is currently curating the Actopolis Sarajevo project, a transnational laboratory dealing with urban issues and experimenting with strategies for action.

www.gradologija.ba

STATEMENT

The public sphere has definitely gone through a number of transformations in my lifetime, from a socialist self-governance system where the public sphere seemed closer to its basic idea to its tremendous collapse from the start of the war from 1992 to 1995 and until the numerous and frequent attempts to reboot it in the post-war period. Today, we face fictional democracies in which it is almost impossible to think public spheres. In the case of Sarajevo, reclaiming it often appears to be a fiction. However, aside from constant efforts to challenge and question power, what we seem to need to create functional democracies is to enable spaces for a new imagination, experiments, tries and failures in which we can create new ideologies of commons pushing our societies further and allowing a much needed transfer of the meaning and nature of the public sphere.

FRANCESCA FERGUSON

Curator of architecture and urban issues Francesca Ferguson (Urban Drift Projects) has developed exhibitions, new formats for dialogue between architects and the public, trans-disciplinary projects and events. She curated the German Pavilion at the 2004 Venice Architecture Biennial, and directed the Swiss Architecture Museum in Basel.

ANGELIKA FITZ

Cultural theorist, curator and author Angelika Fitz works in the fields of architecture, art and urbanism and has curated projects for international museums, cultural institutions and universities. From 1998, she realised several projects in South Asia and curated the Austrian contributions to the International Architecture Biennial in Sao Paulo in 2003 and 2005. Her recent curatorial projects include the platforms We-Traders.

STATEMENT

Who creates public spaces? Can these scattered, often informal practices which we experience in many cities right now really contribute to a new public sphere? Will they even provide alternatives in the face of the current economic, social, and ecological crises? Perhaps the transformative powers of self-organised or semi-institutional practices are not only found in the factual. If they are also perceived as performative practices, they create a differential space that lies beyond the rationality of planning and the logic of utilisation as well as a semantic space that reaches far past the radius of these projects and which continues to maintain our claim to a good life.

EVA FRANCH I GILBERT

New York-based architect, curator, educator and lecturer in experimental forms of art and architectural practice, Eva Franch founded her solo practice OAAA (Office of Architectural Affairs) in 2004. Since 2010, she has been the Chief Curator and Executive Director of Storefront for Art and Architecture in New York. In 2014, with the project OfficeUS, she was selected by the US State Department to represent the United States Pavilion at the XIV Venice Architecture Biennale. Eva Franch has taught at Columbia University GSAPP, the IUAV University of Venice, SUNY Buffalo, and Rice University School of Architecture. www.storefrontnews.org

PEDRO GADANHO

Curator, writer and architect, Pedro Gadanho is the Director of MAAT, the new Museum of Art, Architecture and Technology in Lisbon.

Previously a curator of contemporary architecture at the Museum of Modern Art, New York, he curated exhibitions such as 9+1 Ways of Being Political, Uneven Growth, Endless House and A Japanese Constellation. Pedro Gadanho, who holds an MA in art and architecture and a PhD in architecture and mass media, is also the former editor of BEYOND bookazine, writes the ShrapnelContemporary blog, and regularly contributes to international publications. He is the author of Arquitetura em Público, and a recipient of the 2012 FAD Prize for Thought and Criticism.

STATEMENT

When I visited Tahir Square a couple of months ago, I was overcome by a sense of disillusionment. The government's dystopian design has stripped this public space, the starting place of the Arab Revolution in Egypt, of any potential to trigger or accommodate a spontaneous demonstration by the people of Cairo. With democracy degraded, the State is quick to equate people's appropriation of public space to an act of terrorism—and what was a hopeful fiction may rapidly turn into a dangerous fight. Yet the multiple pressures building in contemporary cities may also become greater than any institutional force. With scarcity inevitable, a time may come a time when no higher power can hold out against it or sustain itself through its own means. This is the moment which certain urban practices seem to be preparing for at present.

BARBARA HOIDN

Barbara Hoidn founded the architecture firm Hoidn Wang Partner in Berlin, Germany, together with Wilfried Wang. After receiving her degree in architecture (Dipl. Ing.) from the University of Karlsruhe, Germany, she was a Loeb Fellow at the Harvard GSD, Cambridge, USA, and taught at the ETH Zurich, the RISD, Providence, RI, and the Harvard GSD. Since 2002, she has been Visiting Associate Professor at the O'Neil Ford Chair at The University of Texas at Austin. From 1994 until 2000, she was head of the office of the Senate Building Director in Berlin. She has curated many exhibitions, symposia and conferences on architectural and urban design topics nationally and internationally, and is the editor of several books and exhibition catalogues.

ELPIDA KARABA

Art theorist and independent curator Elpida Karaba, who also teaches art theory and art history, works with research-based curatorial practices focusing on collaborative working methods. In 2014, the first performance of her in-process curatorial educational program PAT (Temporary Academy of Arts) took place in Peristeri, Athens. Her research interests and publications are specifically related to art theory and criticism, political theory and discourse analysis in documentary, activist and performative art practices.

STATEMENT

Force or fiction: It has to be real. In the realm of the current events, of a harsh economic and humanitarian crisis, reclamation of the public sphere is at the top of the agenda of powerful cultural institutions, universities and museums. The momentum and the challenging of the physiognomy of the enlightened world and contemporary democracy lead to the urgency of powerful institutions to control and regulate. But one should ask, though, about the terms of the reclamation of the public sphere and the specificities of the subjects involved and the place from where they reclaim it, south, east, west, black, etc. One should shed light on the details of this regulation—details we tend to overlook, as power relations and stereotypes are repeated, that relocalize and regionalize the world and the subjects in order to maintain a minimum of the existing status quo. It might perhaps be a realistic approach to invent fictitious assemblies, coalitions, unions and legislation units that will drive forward mechanisms of aligning subjects and so reveal the antagonisms and the contradictions of the reclamation of the public sphere and the anti-humanism vocabularies, and separate trivial from serious claims.

KOOPERATIVE FÜR DARSTELLUNGSPOLITIK

The Kooperative für Darstellungspolitik (Jesko Fezer, Anita Kaspar, Andreas Müller) researches into how political and cultural issues are represented and displayed in the public arena. They regard the spatial designs governing the viewing of exhibitions and displays as a public form of engagement and critical debate, a cultural process of both dialogue and conviction. The policies of display embodied in this approach are directed to these spatial negotiations, opening up discursive social spaces. The Kooperative für Darstellungspolitik has applied these principles to designing exhibitions including Geniale Dilletanten for the Goethe-Institut or The Whole Earth at the Haus der Kulturen der Welt, as well as the interiors of art spaces such as Casco in Utrecht, Index in Stockholm or the foyer of the Arsenal cinema in Berlin.

Léopold Lambert is the author of Weaponized Architecture: The Impossibility of Innocence (dpr-barcelona, 2012), Topie Impitoyable: The Corporeal Politics of the Cloth, the Wall, and the Street (punctum books, 2016) and La politique du bulldozer (B2, 2016).

STATEMENT

FIGHTS. Public space is not a gift from a transcendental entity to the bodies that occupy it. Without struggle to make it 'public', this space is merely the other side of the walls built to privatize space and, as such, public space is the space of exclusion par excellence. The fights for publicness are not fights for a return to the 'natural state' of this space; it is a construction of a sociality through space and bodies. FICTIONS. Through imaginaries, we individually and collectively interpret public space influenced by narratives imposed on it. These narratives should also be the objects of our struggles as they crystalize the normative reading of spaces and the bodies they host. In this regard, we should embrace fiction's subjectivity rather than denigrate it.

STATEMENT

The public sphere is reflected both in the cultural realm of public life and the physical spaces of the city where the production of space and place reflects socio-economic and political realities. This is resulting in increasingly controlled and undemocratic public spaces, yet it is also possible for gatherings of people to push back at these processes by reclaiming public space—and therefore public life. This is a process that can work but often fails, so while it may sometimes appear to be no more than a fiction, it is also essential to any rebooting of democracy.

STATEMENT

Since the beginning of the history of capitalism, people have been encouraged to remain isolated as they travel from living space to working space. Travel time between home and work is often too long, so that the traditional notion of a working day divided into three—8 hours of work, leisure and rest—is now a forgotten dream in nearly every region of the world. Increasingly, public space is the place for rebooting democracies and the trigger for social transformation processes. Despite all the new and advanced systems of social control—from total surveillance to terrorism—they are less effective where people can gather together.

OMAR NAGATI

Omar Nagati is a practicing architect and urban planner, and the co-founder of CLUSTER, an urban design and research platform downtown Cairo. Having graduated from Cairo University, he studied and taught at UBC, Vancouver and UC Berkeley. Nagati adopts an interdisciplinary approach to urban history and design, and engages in empirical research and critical mapping of urban informality. He teaches part-time Urban Design Studio at the MSA University in Giza and is currently a visiting professor at the University of Sheffield, UK.

STATEMENT

The question does not seem to be mutually exclusive: In principle, society's reclamation of public sphere is a necessary means to reboot democracy. However, in most societies today, public sphere has been hijacked by either authoritarian states or neoliberal forces. As revolutionary moments are not attainable in the near future, civil society groups are left with reformist strategies and subversive tactics of negotiation. Stuck between right-wing ideologies, of market and religious fundamentalism, of state's and extremists' violence, it is imperative to carve out and articulate a third space that is progressive and inclusive, mediating idealist vision through grounded practice.

NICHE BERLIN

Making Spaces is an online platform concerning itself with the work of female spatial practitioners (architects, urbanists, sociologists, curators, critics, etc.) and their innovative approaches to our urban landscape. Initiated by Niche Berlin, together with Valerie Chartrain, Christina Landbrecht, Rosario Talevi, Miriam Stoney and Fiona Shipwright, it is dedicated to creating networks, improving practitioners' visibility and interrogating the parameters of success in outmoded institutional frameworks. Founded by art historians Stefanie Gerke and Nele Heinevetter as well as architect Katharina Beckmann, the interdisciplinary cultural agency NICHE BERLIN offers new perspectives through custom-made art and architecture tours, art exhibitions and architecture research projects. Initiated by DJs and academics Daniela Seitz and Anja Weigl, the event series CREAMCAKE showcases upcoming artists with a strong focus on digital culture. Both women-run, Niche Berlin and Creamcake share an interest in new perspectives, freeing up space and presenting their discoveries in Berlin.

STATEMENT

In the last century, urban public space was increasingly captured by States as their private property in the name of an abstract entity called 'all'. Especially towards the end of the century, though, political power, expressed in the democratic model in the form of States, had totally merged with economic power. The combination of both movements provoked the colonisation of public spaces as mere instruments of rent for the real state financial complex, emptying the very notion of 'public'. For that reason, the present reclamation of public space—not as an agenda, but as an actual practice—is one of the most powerful tactics to reinvent democracy.

TENTATIVE COLLECTIVE

The Tentative Collective's projects are lived engagements with the sensory and social architectures of the city. Navigating through precarious urban geographies, they create poetic and ephemeral moments in conversation with the city's infrastructures and comment on the conditions of modernity which they struggle with in everyday life. The Tentative Collective strives to be collaborative, site sensitive, and open to a diverse range of participants.

STATEMENT

The rhetoric of the 'reclamation of public space' is often accompanied by a liberal assumption of ideal and desired publics. The utopian democratic space must be reviewed carefully to acknowledge that, as a necessary condition, it often excludes carving out a designated space for particular activities. How do gender, class and ethnicity influence the conception and formation of public spaces in South Asian cities? In Karachi the use of the public space discourse excludes the flexible and transforming nature of the street as a gathering space, home as a public and entrepreneurial platform, park or plaza as private space—invisible space, accidental and left over and appropriated space. In cities where infrastructure is always far behind the needs of the people and indeed often encroaching on the lives of the less privileged, the vernacular and informal co-opting of planned spaces for unplanned activities marks a formidable shift in the rhetoric of planned civic life.

WILFRIED WANG

Wilfried Wang (Hamburg) founded the architecture firm Hoidn Wang Partner in Berlin, Germany, together with Baraba Hoidn. After studying architecture in London, he taught and lectured at various schools of architecture and, since 2002, has been the O'Neil Ford Centennial Professor in Architecture at the University of Texas at Austin. The author and editor of various architectural monographs and topographs is also co-editor of the O'Neil Ford Monograph and Duograph Series and founding co-editor with Nadir Tharani of 9H Magazine. He served from 1995 to 2000 as the Director of the German Architecture Museum, and was co-director with Ricky Burdett of the 9H Gallery. In addition, he is the Chair of the Schelling Architecture Foundation Executive Committee, a foreign member of the Royal Swedish Academy of Fine Arts, Stockholm, an honorary member of the Portuguese Chamber of Architects, and a member and deputy director of the architecture section of the Akademie der Künste, Berlin. He has been awarded an honorary doctorate by the KTH Royal Institute of Technology, Stockholm.

STATEMENT

Where but in physical public space is there a common, shared medium where everyone present is potentially an equal, free from the fear of being surveilled, from having one's identity matched with one's preferences? The Internet is already lost to paranoid and ineffective quasi-governmental secret services and equally secretive international corporations. The one physical public space we have needs to be defended and reclaimed for our collective and individual freedoms. Without these collective and individual freedoms, there can be no true democracy. This constant process of reclamation needs to encompass the assertion of all basic freedoms and the proper care, maintenance and design of physical public space. Unfortunately, few people realise the dangers confronting democracy today. Many people are satisfied with what they have, some not even aware there is a problem, and many of those who are conscious of the threats are too intimidated by the mechanisms of power to voice their concerns. Thus, today, we are gradually and inexorably losing the foundations of democracy.

EYAL WEIZMAN

Architect Eyal Weizman is Professor of Spatial and Visual Cultures, and Director of the Centre for Research Architecture at Goldsmiths, University of London. He is a founding member of the architectural collective DAAR in Beit Sahour/Palestine. He has published widely, and his books include Mengele's Skull (with Thomas Keenan; Sterenberg Press, 2012), Forensic Architecture (DOCUMENTA13 notebook, 2012), The Least of all Possible Evils (Nottetempo 2009, Verso 2011), Hollow Land (Verso, 2007), A Civilian Occupation (Verso, 2003), the series Territories 1, 2 and 3, and Yellow Rhythms. In addition, he has contributed many articles to journals, magazines and collections of essays. He has worked with a variety of NGOs worldwide, and was a member of the B'Tselem board of directors. Eyal Weizman has lectured, curated and organised conferences in many institutions worldwide.

SOPHIE WOLFRUM

Urbanist and urban designer Sophie Wolfrum studied spatial planning at the University of Dortmund, and took the state examination in urban design. With Alban Janson she founded the award-winning architectural office Janson + Wolfrum Architektur + Stadtplanung. Since 2003, she has been Professor of Urban Design and Regional Planning at TU Munich. A member of the German Academy for Urban Regional Spatial Planning (DASL), she was the Dean of the Faculty of Architecture TUM from 2012 to 2014. Her main research areas include the city as architecture and performative urbanism.

STATEMENT

Urbanity makes it possible to be alien, different, to abandon established roles. This coolness in proximity to one another is what makes tolerance possible and unfamiliarity endurable. It is against this backdrop that the city is also described as an 'engine of tolerance', a classical definition of urbanity in urban sociology since Simmel's times. Today, apart from the site of tolerance, we also emphasise the site of solidarity as a crucial public sphere. As a result, the definition of urbanity also changes as the political aspect of social solidarity increasingly gains in importance. In this dialectic of solidarity and tolerance we see the power of cities to manage migration and social conflicts, establish debates and live democracy. The public sphere in cities is entirely linked to public space, the essential prerequisite in cities for practicing democracy.

PETER ZLONICKY

Peter Zlonicky is Professor Emeritus of Urban Planning and Design at the Technical University in Dortmund. He has led many major research projects on social aspects of housing and on the future development of inner city areas. As Scientific Director in the International Building Exhibition 'EmscherPark' he was member of a multidisciplinary team restructuring the region and creating a new 'green-blue infrastructure'. As head of the Office of Urban Studies, Munich, Peter Zlonicky has overseen leading urban planning projects in Bonn and in Berlin (parliamentary and governmental districts in both cities), as well as city development projects in Dortmund, Mannheim/Ludwigshafen, Muenster and Weimar. In his work as a consultant, he has been involved in cooperation projects in Brazil, Egypt, Gambia, Haiti, Syria, Morocco, Israel/Palestine, Libya, and Sibiu/Romania. Since 2007, he has been consultant to the Policy Board on National Urban Development Policy in Berlin. Peter Zlonicky was awarded the Federal Order of Merit in recognition of his lifetime work.

STATEMENT

Public space as common ground of civil society Public space is the fingerprint of our cities—it shapes the cities individuality, its cultural, social, economic identity. It is owned by the civil society, and it should be a common ground.

Central issues

Public space has an indispensable significance for communication. Especially in times of communication by public media, citizens need an open urban space to meet and act in. Public space has a compensatory social function. In times of low standards of housing (poverty, migrants) open space can offer a substitute for small apartments (parks, spaces without economic obligations, etc.). Public space serves as a political forum. In case of conflicts, civil society has the right to use public space to express messages and discuss different positions as well as common levels of understanding.

Common conditions

The requirements for a common ground need some clear agreements between citizens and their political board, such as ...

- free access to public space for everybody day and night at any time,
- balance between functional (infrastructure, mobility etc.) and individual use,
- restrictions on the commercial use of public space,
- limits of public surveillance,
- public participation.

Some of these basic requirements will have an impact on the city budget.

Political turn to common ground

Planning activities have to set priorities: Public space first! After first setting the framework of public space, decisions on private projects can follow.

Decisions on city development, especially the release of public-owned space for private and commercial use, need to be heedful of how they affect the quality of public life. Any reduction in public space must be balanced.

The transparency of city development is a precondition for public participation, and public participation is a precondition for the revaluation of public space to common ground.

Common ground is the laboratory of communication between citizens and democratic boards.
